RepliFa

LENYITAI MA

RepliFa aims to challenge the well-established Eurocentric fashion system. It questions authority at a fundamental level, including the Philosophy of the body, the modes of representation, and the historical forces that have subtly shaped the way people understand garments.

Throughout my fashion education, I found myself navigating between the dominant Western ideals and my own cultural aesthetics. Flat-cutting, spacious silhouettes, and their philosophy were labeled “improper,” echoing my experiences of cultural displacement.

Under the Western pursuit of the ideal body and the perfect proportions, garments are designed with strong silhouettes, almost like a structured shell or armor. In this way, the body is shaped, disciplined, and molded into a predetermined form.

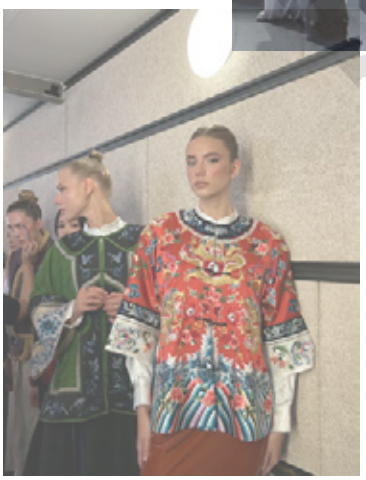
What I Consider Bad Designs and Stereotypes



They often inevitably fall into a framework constrained by doctrines, thus allowing Orientalism to be repeatedly reproduced within the design context.

The lack of sufficient academic awareness, as well as long-term, systematic engagement through experience, reflection, and research.
The outcomes often resemble rigid collages of cultural fragments rather than genuine cultural understanding.

Therefore, I believe that all patterns should originate from archaeological findings and museum archives; only by reconstructing based on AUTHENTIC ARTIFACTS can the lost aesthetic be truly embodied.

As one of the Three Great Campaigns of the Wanli Emperor in the Ming dynasty, the Ming intervention in Korea against Japan was a powerful display of imperial authority. It demonstrated the military power of the Ming court.

Adding pockets behind the FLARE GUARDS — along with a pair of detachable, exaggeratedly proportioned flare gurads — renders the very act of "showing off" in a more tangible, concrete form.

As the upper-layer garment faded over time, its dye seeped into the cotton robe beneath, creating a symmetrical pattern that resembles a skeleton.

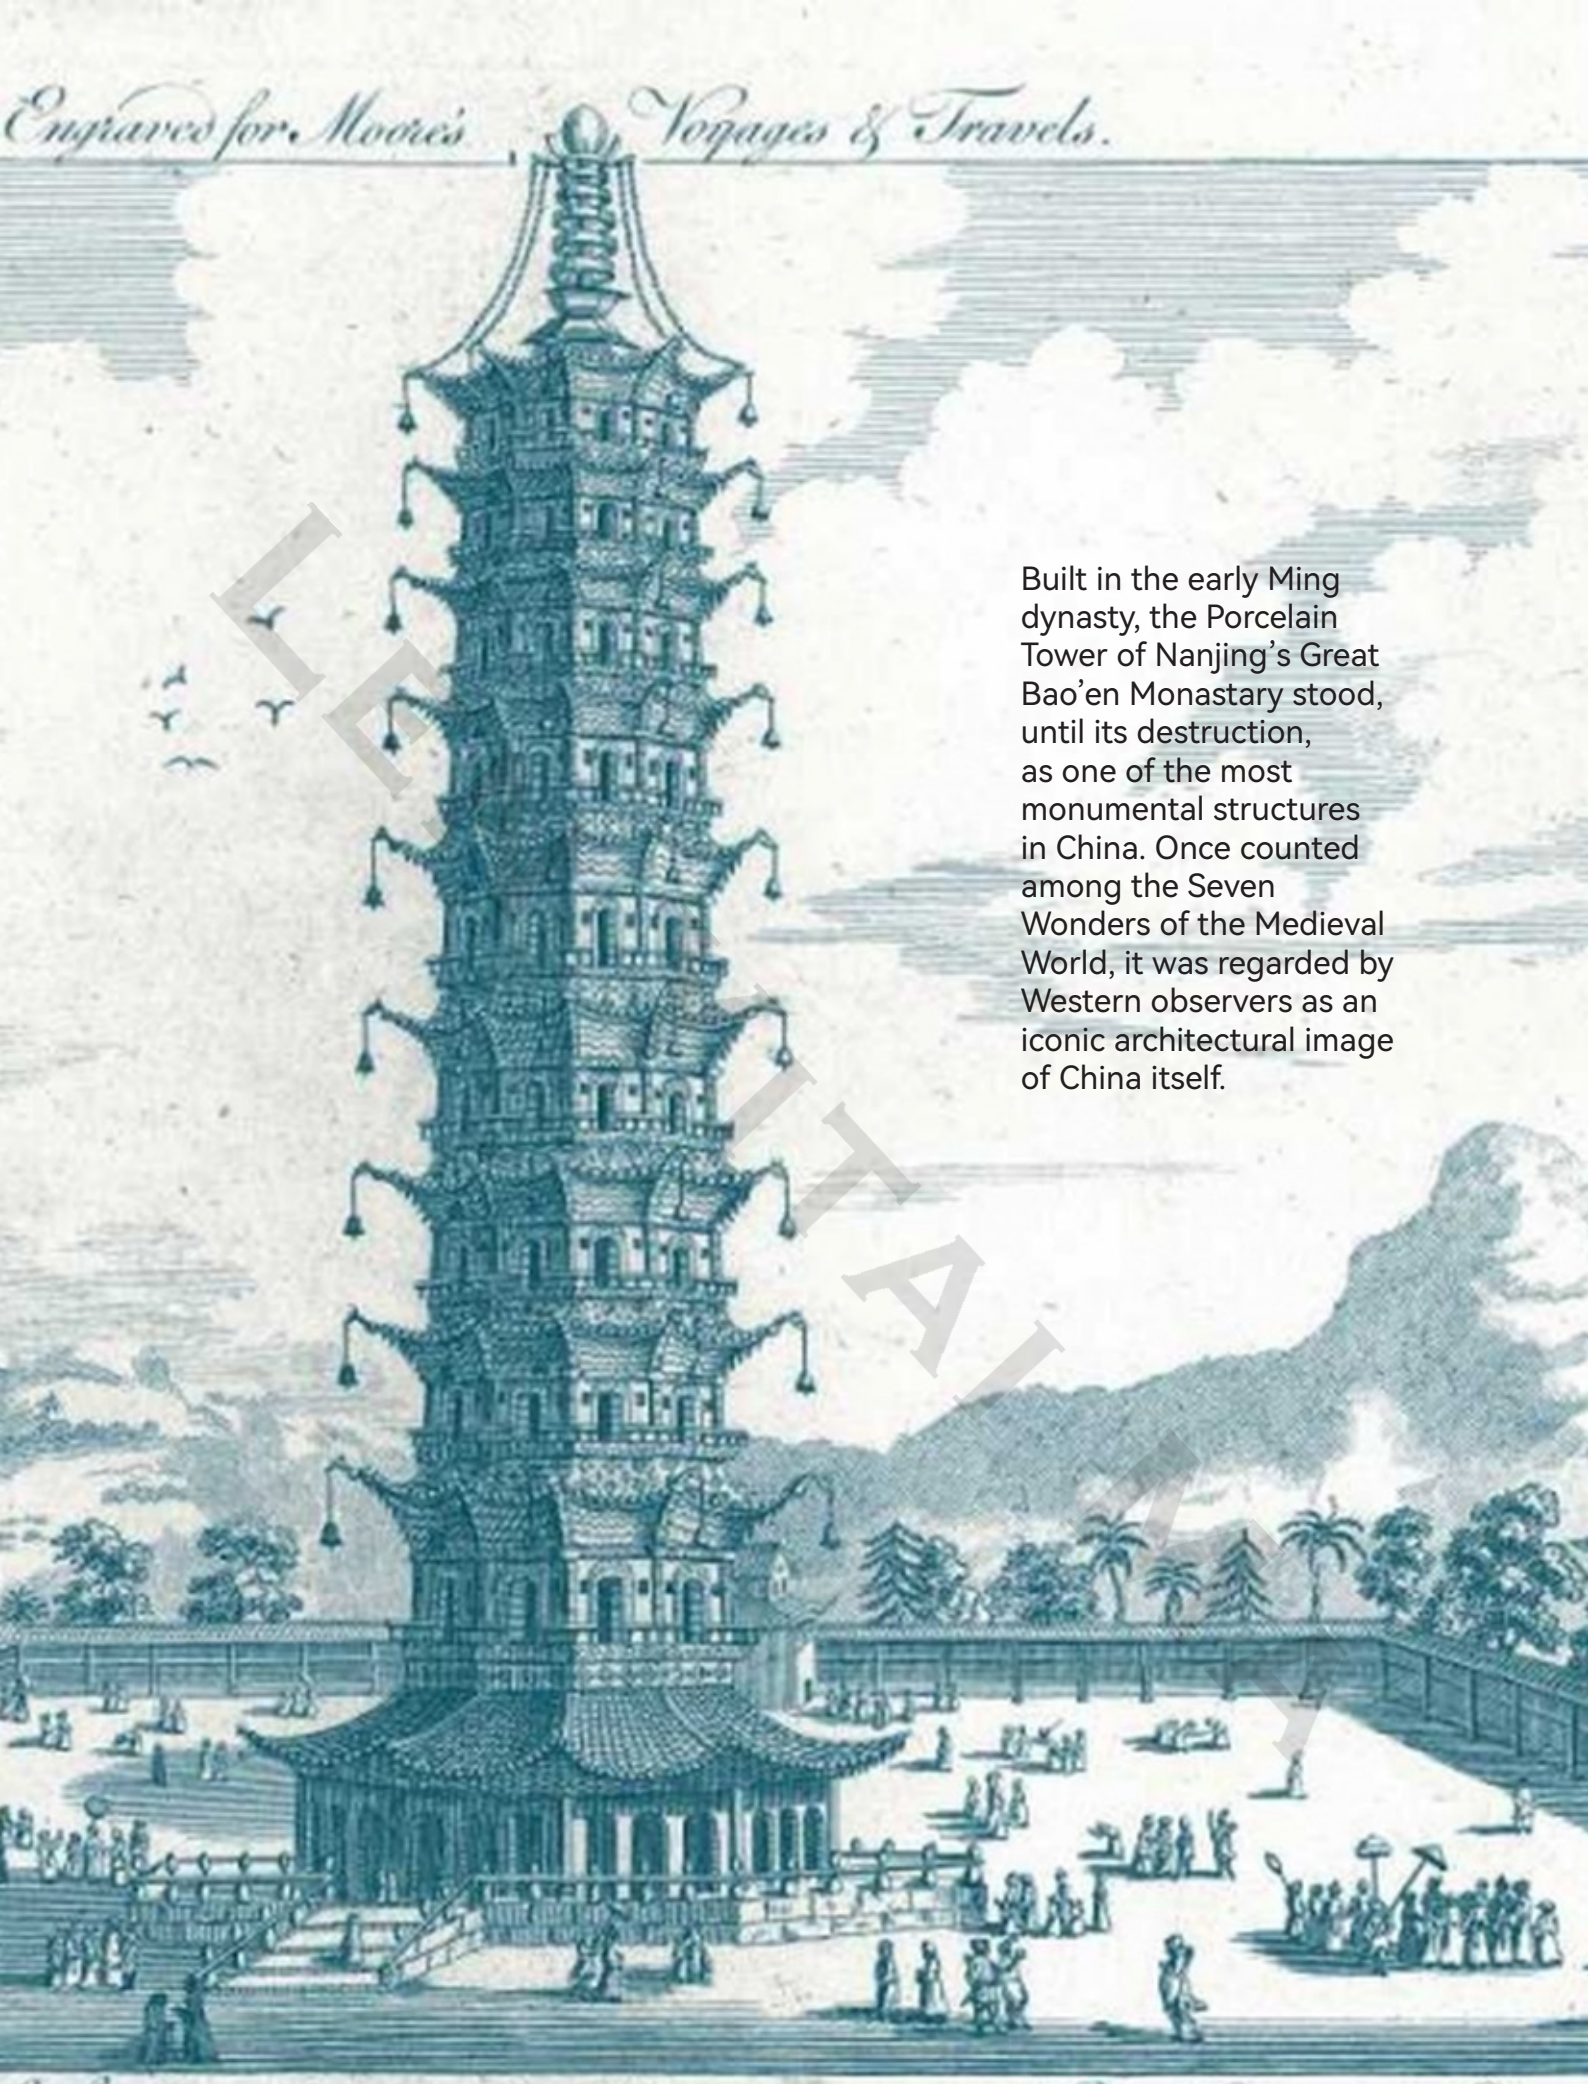
LEMMA



Built in the early Ming dynasty, the Porcelain Tower of Nanjing's Great Bao'en Monastary stood, until its destruction, as one of the most monumental structures in China. Once counted among the Seven Wonders of the Medieval World, it was regarded by Western observers as an iconic architectural image of China itself.

TENTATIVE

The pagoda shoulder is one of the most extreme expressions of “power” within Western tailoring. By combining it with the 摆 (flare guard), I am intentionally repositioning the Western as a secondary element rather than the dominant.

MUSIC TIP

Hemingway

In boxing, the best fighter in the world is established as indisputable fact based on who cleans whose clock more efficiently. In rap battles, "the greatest" is a more ambiguous title. At the moment, so many hip-hop pundits are pinning that tag on Jay-Z, there's a risk of it becoming reality by force of repetition. There's also the risk of inferring greatness by association: Jay-Z collaborated often with the late Notorious B.I.G., and on the twenty-seven-year-old's new album, In My Lifetime, Vol. 1, he's joined by the heavyweights of modern black music: Puff Daddy, Lil' Kim, Teddy Riley, Foxy Brown, and Babyface.

But it's Jay-Z who holds the album together, and it's his Brooklyn B-boy voice we remember when the record ends. He raps with a nearly accidental eloquence that breathes life into what might otherwise be just the same old tales in the life of a player. He's the Hemingway of hip-hop, spilling words as easily as most of us spill a drink. Armed with a microphone and a mind like a microscope, Jay
